Concerning those green fireballs seen around Arizona (SEARCHLIGHT #4) I believe that they are automatic robots picking up information from Atomic test and along earth fault lines and each disc is operated by beings in gigantic spaceships above the Earth.

During the last World War everybody in England was familiar with both our aircraft and foreign ones, but according to psycologists for the silence group we people seeing a flying, solid object that reflects light from its metal surface, are suffering from bad hallucinations. So Prof. Tombough and his statement that he saw a UFO was erroneus? A British astronomer when interviewed a few years ago exclaimed "there is a Bridge in the Mare Crisium area and its not artificial, but built by humans". So too when a Patrolman Zamorra sighted an actual landing of a UFO and saw small beings around the outside of the spaceship making him a patient, like the other two scientists, for a mental home.

Such evidence cannot be ignored and since I have complete faith in UFOs and their occupants the so called phenomena of green fireballs are for cleaning the earth's atmosphere clean after contamination with mankind's primitive methods of A Bomb explosions, both on and underneath the planet's surface. Kenneth W. Milestone, Blackpool, England

I see that in the most recent issue of THE SEARCHLIGHT you have published an article by Richard Shaver. I know Dick personally, having met him during the summer of 1951. He is sincere, and will not give you a lot of wool...If you think that transistors, integrated circuits, thin flim devices, masers, lasers, and other electronic developments are recent you are in for a big surprise. Cavern mech electronics are all solid-state, even the big vision screens. The reason for this is because solid-state devices are much more reliable than vacuum tubes, and will last practically forever when operated properly. On the other hand tubes are fragile and eventually burn or wear out. I am interested in hearing from other of your readers who would like to exchange correspondence on this topic. Victor C. Johnston, 3300 North Bryant, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 73121.

Victor Pence's article on the "Mobius Strip" reminded me of a Long John TV show where someone, it may have been Randi, discussed various strange patterns and results of simply folding pieces of paper in strange ways; one resulting in what was termed a "hexa-hexa-flexigon". While "flexing" one, some people noticed that one of their number accidentally got his tie caught between the folds. Rather than being able to seperate himself from its grasp, further "flexing" engulfed him entirely, and he did not reappear until others were "flexing" their "hexa-hexa-flexigon" in another part of the world, and found the poor soul within. While I interpret the discussion as primarily "tongue-in-cheek," there might conceivably have been some degree of truth in this matter, and it might therefore present some connection with the "Mobius Strip" concept. The parallel world hypothesis is nothing new to science-fiction aficionados, and even readers of the Superman series of comic magazines; yet it has always intrigued me. I might add that Tom Comella (Peter Kor) has views that apparently concern a 4D or parallel world origin for UFOs. Eugene R. Steinberg, Brooklyn 3, New York

In August, 1950, a 7-year old boy named Ronald Coyne lost the sight in his right eye due to an accident. This happened at Sapulpa, Oklahoma. Medical doctors placed a new plastic eye in the empty eye-socket. On about June 20, 1951, Coyne attended a religious revival in Sapulpa, and a lady evangelist prayed that his eye would heal. According to reports Ronald began to see at this moment through the plastic eye. He was later tested by medical doctors and affidavits were printed attesting to this miracle. He has since moved to Missouri where I still here from him from time to time. Kenneth L. Larson, Los angeles, California

BY: PLACES OF? INTEREST?
JOHN J. ROBINSON Assistant Editor
THE SEARCHLIGHT

As Assistant Editor I hope to do a series of short articles on some places which may be of questionable interest, to the readers of "Searchlight". The articles will appear every-so-often under the above heading. I will choose various places and describe for the readers why that particular section may hold an interest for them. Some of these places may be "Old Hat" to some of the readers. If they are I hope they will bear with me, for not everyone may have this extensive knowledge. It may be that the reader also knows of a place of this type. If so he is invited to write up the details for this column, or he may write direct to me at, 134 New York Avenue, Jersey City, N.J., 07307. I shall be glad to correspond with him regarding his place of ? Interest ?, and then write it up for our readers giving him credit for his information, of course.

THE NAHANNI VALLEY

The Nahanni Valley is a warm mist covered valley of an area which covers close to 250 square miles. It is located in the southern end of the Mackenzie Mountains of Canada. It also lies almost 550 miles due west of Fort Simpson on the Mackenzie River of northwest Canada.

This portion of northwest Canada is above the 60° latitude which is in the same latitude as is the Yukon Territory. This portion of the northland becomes very cold in the winter, however the valley never becomes as cold as the surrounding country. Hot springs and sulphur geysers are plentiful in the valley, therefore the valley is covered by mist, while the temperature always remains at least a good thirty degrees above normal. The foliage and trees in the valley remain verdant during the entire year while the growth is heavier than in the surrounding section.

Strange as it may seem this warm area in a region which becomes bitter cold is not inhabited by anything but the animals who seek warmth during those cold winter months. Even though the valley is rich in fur bearing animals, it is reported that trappers will not follow the animals into or trap in this valley.

The Indian tribes of the area avoid it and the list is an impressive one, for it includes the Ojibways, the Slave, the Dogribs, the Stoney, the Beavers and the Chipweyans.

The Nahanni valley, my readers must understand, is not a veritable tropical paradise in the midst of the white wastes of Canada. No prehistoric monsters; left overs from the Cretaceous or Jurassic periods of the late Mesozoic age, roam this section, Pterodactyl do not soar above it nor do Coelacanth reside in the run offs of the hot springs and geysers. No Neanderthal or Cro Magnon men are resident, the Yeti (Abominable Snowmen), Big Foot nor the Sacquach do not haunt this valley. Legends have so claimed but none have ever been seen. True huge foot prints have been found imprinted in the former sandy soil which is now shale and in other type of prehistoric rock--but there were giants on the earth then. The Elders!

Why then do the humans who live near this valley not take advantage of its warmth, as the animals do, why do humans eschew its comfort in the cold winter months?

Because of one reason the valley is known as "The Valley of Headless Men". Although no one or any thing has been seen in this valley, those who were foolhardy enough to enter it in search of gold, which is said to be in the valley, have been found by various search parties (Who were never molested) as cadavers minus their heads or I should state as skeletons minus a skull.

A few very bold white fur hunters have gone into the valley and returned with a rich catch, they could never be persuaded to return the second time. They said that the utter loneliness of the country, the eternal mists, which made you see things which were not there along with the feeling that something was watching you was just too much to take again. The Indians cannot be persuaded to enter the valley, they act as if there were some unseen and unknown force in it which it was best to fear.

Some headstrong and now headless seekers of gold have entered this valley. The list of those who lost their heads over the gold in the Nahanni valley is as follows: two brothers William and Frank Macleod, John Potter a prospector who was strong, tough, and experienced, he was found a year later by a search party, minus his head with an exploded cartridge in the rifle which the bones of his hand still cluched. Examination showed that he had not starved to death for he still had a cache of food, he had merely lost the means of ingesting it. Later a fearless sourdough came from the Yukon Territory. Undaunted by the tales of danger, he set off into the valley. When he had not returned after two years, a search party located his remains, minus a head, with cans of food in a knapsack.

Two more men who entered the valley at later dates have also been found by searching parties, both as headless corpses. One thing which stands out in all the deaths which have occurred in this valley is that those persons who entered the valley in search of anything which related to the earth or under the earth have been found decapitated. Search parties and bold trappers who were not interested in anything which lay below the surface were not molested.

There is something in this valley which the Indians fear -- some unknown something which relates to the underground which maintains the secrecy of "The Valley of the Headless Men".

UNDERGROUND MAN

By: Pippa Braybrook - Eng. Reporter

We need not ask if man can live underground: he is already doing so. The Doomsday Men of today live in silos under the deserts of the United States in the area of Montana, Nevada, Colorado, Texas, California and New Mexico. They live and work in bomb proof capsules, two hundred feet underground. A fifty megaton bomb, they are told, would only destroy their capsule and emergency rations were it a direct hit. All these "silo-sitters" are under orders from Strategic Aerospace Division at Vandenburg Air Force Base on the California Coast between Los Angeles and San Francisco.

How would civilians enjoy life underground? In Texas, Mr. and Mrs. Rogers have built a ten room house thirteen feet underground which should last 1,000 years. It is built within a concrete shell and has windows painted to simulate different times of day. Apparently plants and animals can prosper as well as people. Air conditioning means dust never accumulates.

"The Sunday Observer" sent a reporter to Operation Deep Freeze in Antarctica, last December. Again fantastic as it sounds, men are living under the ice. The reporter said: "We made for a sloping ramp diving down into the ice. It led to a cave-like entrance, where the light struck blue through the snow overhead. We found ourselves in a straight dim tunnel, electrically lit, with solid huts at intervals, raised up from the ice floor." This was at Byrd Station and we will hear more of Admiral Byrd. At the South Pole itself, the reporter was taken through a wooden door into an electrically lit shaft, starting deep into the ice, with glistening satin-smooth walls. Some way down, a short side passage led to a rough-cut snow cavern, filled with an apparatus for measuring ice-flow. The ice flows fifty feet a year towards McMurdo Sound. This is an ice cave laboratory indeed and another shaft (but horizontal) exists full of earthquake detectors, recorders of magnetic fields and cosmic rays which has to be negotiated on hands and knees.

Why is the South Pole so important to scientists? Because here it is possible to look out into space through a kind of funnel in the earth's magnetic field; rockets could leave the earth through these funnels. Science is also proving a claim made in George Hunt Williamson's book "Other Tongues Other Flesh" that earth's magnetic field can be used as a "duct" to link with the opposite Pole; for instance, Byrd Station connects with a Canadian Station at Great Whale River. In this scientific atmosphere, it is very difficult to believe that a sensational discovery of "the Seven Cities of Antarctica" had been made and not communicated to the world, but there are strange light effects, "white-outs", which could turn a pilot's attention from matters he is not meant to see yet.

If man has lived underground and voyaged through the earth by tunnel, surely there would be some memory evident in folklore? Such strange evidences are given in the British Edda with illustrations from Sumerian and Hittite seals in Prof. Wadell's book of that name. The seals come from the Middle East because it is the cradle of mythology, each country having adapted stories according to its geographic features.

A Hittite rock sculpture shows a hideous snake-bodied Matriarch emerging from a cavern. Out of her many names, we will call her El, the name Shaver chooses for the wise Elders, who, before the sun's radio-activity drove men underground, had achieved such command of matter-energy, space and time they could shift the axis of the earth (See Haggard's "When the Earth Shook").

The Sibyl of the Edda speaks of El:

"I see here cellar stands
Far from the sunlight;
I see, under the cellar,
The horny ORM serpent."

The cavern entrances were carefully guarded by wolf tribe attendants. Another Hittite rock sculpture in Cappadocia shows creatures more bear-like than wolf-headed, standing upright with wings sprouting from their shoulders. One stands guard by a clearly-marked circular door carved as with precision instruments. However, sometimes the cavern gate is latticed.

"Old is that latticed gate,
But fewfolk wit
How its latch is lock'd."

Here lived El and Wotan and their son, Loki, the fire God, drinking from a magic bowl through tubes. Note the spaceman-like appearance of the drinkers and the strange animal being speared and the webbed fingers of all.

"From Archaic Hittite seal from Kul-teppe near Caesarea in Cappadocia."

One linguistic mystery here is that Eden is underground. The whole Edda is well worth study as it contains not only descriptions of life underground but also of aerial warfare. Unfortunately, even the best English translation is somewhat incoherent, due to the conciseness of ancient languages.

The peoples of Asia Minor believed Scorpion-men inhabited the mountains of the East and every morning they unfolded a great folding door in the mountain side and the Sun God Shamash set forth on his daily journey. He carries what looks like a weapon or, perhaps, a key. At evening, his chariot descends to the Mountain of the West, a gate opens and he penetrates the earth and, perhaps by tunnel, he returns to the Eastern Mountains. The Babylonian hero; Gilgamesh, penetrated the mountain. For hours he walked through darkness and then emerged into light and found a wonderful garden which lay beside a sea. More familiar is the myth of Adonia. He was born of a tree and his tree-mother put him in a coffer which she gave to Persephone who opened it and refused to give him up. All these complicated myths suggest a divine race lives underground and the human dead there could be reanimated, perhaps like Adonis, they are in suspended animation in coffers.

Is a race living underground, now, which may emerge? William Habington, a 17th century poet, speaking of conquerors, says:

"from the farthest North,
Some nation may,
Yet undiscovered, issue forth,
And, o'er his new-got conquest sway
Some nation yet shut in
With hills of ice
May be let out to scourge his sinne
Till they shall equall him in vice." (Oxford Book of Christian Verse)

To come absolutely u-to-date, Fred Hoyle in "A for Andromeda" ends his famous novel and T.V. play, with the sinister thought, as the hero finds that computer-created creature has drowned in a cavern pool,:

"He had a half-delirious fear of something unspeakable coming out of the tunnel mouth. Something unquenchable from a thousand million, million miles away, something that had first spoken to him on a dark night such as this."

Fantastic? As Shakespeare says in "A Midsummer Night's Dream": "I'll believe as soon this whole world may be bored and that the moon may through the centre creep."
